

“William Boekestein’s The Future of Everything is a gem of a book. This is a ‘once-over’—a survey of the whole field of eschatology—yet it doesn’t treat the topics lightly. In addition to discussing our Lord’s return and the millennium, Boekestein addresses death and dying, the intermediate state, as well as the nature of heaven. He includes a very helpful discussion of the kingdom of God as well when he addresses how our views on eschatology should inform our understanding of the church’s mission. I highly recommend it for personal use (and even devotions) as well as church study groups interested in the topic. Well done, Rev. Boekestein!”

—Kim Riddlebarger, senior pastor at Christ Reformed Church in Anaheim (URCNA), cohost of the White Horse Inn, and visiting professor of systematic theology at Westminster Seminary California

“William Boekestein has served the church well by writing The Future of Everything. Anyone looking for a primer on eschatology will discover an excellent resource in these pages. Boekestein addresses the range of subjects that fall under the heading of eschatology in an accessible and concise yet informative way. Most importantly, every Christian reading this little volume will find their eyes directed more toward heaven and their hearts stirred by the eternal promises of God.”

—Jason Helopoulos, senior pastor at University Reformed Church

“Pastor Boekestein has written a simple but solid and, at times, searching guide to eschatology. This is not in any way a ‘theoretical’ book, but rather one that is immensely practical for all Christians. I personally think many will find this to be clear and compelling on topics of great importance.”

—Mark Jones, pastor at Faith Vancouver PCA

“In the Bible and the early church, eschatology was the fundamental category of the gospel—the kingdom of God has come. But in many years in between, eschatology has been moved to the back burner as mere reflection on the future. In this book William Boekestein invites us to reconsider this marginalization of eschatology. Some eschatological vision will shape our understanding of the meaning of human life and missionary calling of the church today, and Boekestein calls us back to a biblical one. May God use this book to equip the church to live more and more in light of the present and coming kingdom of God.”

—Michael W. Goheen, adjunct professor of missional theology,
Covenant Theological Seminary

“This is definitely a book I’d give my friends who want to understand the end times from a biblical perspective. Grounded in Scripture, The Future of Everything is immensely practical—at least for everyone who will die one day. I heartily recommend it!”

—Michael Horton, J. Gresham Machen Professor of Theology, Westminster Seminary California

“Eschatology is practical. William Boekestein does every Christian a favor by treating this practical subject in such a practical and simple way. He manages to do this without being superficial. I highly recommend his little book.”

—Sam Waldron, president of Covenant Baptist Theological Seminary

“A brief simple book on the end times? Is that possible? You have it in your hands, and with just a little effort you can soon have it in your head and heart. It will not only prepare you for the end but also equip you to prepare others for eternity.”

—David Murray, professor of Old Testament and practical theology at Puritan Reformed Theological Seminary

“Here is a clear, orderly survey of what the Bible teaches us to expect as God works out His purpose for His world.”

—J. I. Packer, Board of Governors’ Professor of Theology, Emeritus, Regent College

“This volume succeeds admirably in presenting biblical teaching on the end times for a broad readership yet without sacrificing substance. It rescues ‘eschatology’ from becoming an abstract word by emphasizing throughout the relevance and practical implications of what will take place at Christ’s return for the present life of Christians and the mission of the church in the world. The series of questions that accompany each chapter make it ideal for individual and group study.”

—Richard B. Gaffin Jr., professor emeritus of biblical and systematic theology, Westminster Theological Seminary

“Here is a truly excellent guide to the Christian’s blessed hope. William Boekestein begins with the principles that safely guide us through this minefield, then helps us to see what the Bible really says about our personal future and the future of the world. I especially love its closing chapters, which show us how these truths impact our lives in the world and the church. Enjoy the full menu—including the sobering reality of hell and the ecstasy of heaven! Here is a pastor inviting us to a soul-enriching study through a captivating book that is hard to put down.”

—Conrad Mbewe, pastor of Kabwata Baptist Church, chancellor of African Christian University,
Lusaka, Zambia

THE FUTURE OF EVERYTHING

THE FUTURE OF EVERYTHING

Essential Truths about the End Times

William Boekestein

Reformation Heritage Books

Grand Rapids, Michigan

The Future of Everything

© 2019 by William Boekestein

All rights reserved. No part of this book may be used or reproduced in any manner whatsoever without written permission except in the case of brief quotations embodied in critical articles and reviews. Direct your requests to the publisher at the following addresses:

Reformation Heritage Books

2965 Leonard St. NE

Grand Rapids, MI 49525

616-977-0889

orders@heritagebooks.org

www.heritagebooks.org

Unless otherwise indicated, Scripture taken from the New King James Version®. Copyright © 1982 by Thomas Nelson. Used by permission. All rights reserved.

Scripture quotations marked ESV are from the ESV® Bible (The Holy Bible, English Standard Version®), copyright © 2001 by Crossway, a publishing ministry of Good News Publishers. Used by permission. All rights reserved.

Scripture taken from the NEW AMERICAN STANDARD BIBLE®, Copyright © 1960, 1962, 1963, 1968, 1971, 1972, 1973, 1975, 1977, 1995 by The Lockman Foundation. Used by permission.

Unless otherwise indicated, all confessional references are from The Reformed Confessions of the 16th and 17th Centuries in English Translation, ed. James T. Dennison Jr., 4 vols. Grand Rapids: Reformation Heritage Books, 2008–2014, and are identified by volume and page number.

Unless otherwise indicated, all italics in quotations are original. All italics in Scripture quotations are added.

Printed in the United States of America

19 20 21 22 23 24/10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Names: Boekestein, William, author.

Title: The future of everything : essential truths about the end times / William Boekestein.

Description: Grand Rapids, Michigan : Reformation Heritage Books, 2019. | Includes bibliographical references.

Identifiers: LCCN 2018054873 (print) | LCCN 2019003859 (ebook) | ISBN 9781601786883 (epub) | ISBN 9781601786876 (pbk. : alk. paper)

Subjects: LCSH: Eschatology. | End of the world.

Classification: LCC BT821.3 (ebook) | LCC BT821.3 .B638 2019 (print) | DDC 236—dc23

LC record available at <https://lcn.loc.gov/2018054873>

For additional Reformed literature, request a free book list from Reformation Heritage Books at the above regular or email address.

To my brothers

Nate, Jeremy, John,

and the many other “Bible Study Men” over the years—dear friends and fellow anticipators of Jesus’s glorious return.

Contents

Prefaceix

PART 1: INTRODUCING ESCHATOLOGY

1. Why Should I Study the End Times? 3
2. How Can I Understand Prophecy? 13

PART 2: PERSONAL ESCHATOLOGY

3. We're All Going to Die 25
4. Between Death and the End..... 37

PART 3: GENERAL ESCHATOLOGY

5. He's Coming Again..... 47
6. A Thousand Years? 57
7. The Dead Will Rise..... 69
8. The Final Judgment 79
9. Hell..... 89
10. The New Heavens and Earth..... 101

PART 4: APPLIED ESCHATOLOGY

11. The End Times and the Kingdom of God 115
12. The End Times and the Mission of the Church 125
Study Questions..... 137
Selected Bibliography 161

Preface

The Anglican poet John Donne (1572–1631) was once ravished with a fever that he feared might kill him. From his sickbed he could hear the sounds of a funeral. In fact, his home was close enough to the church that he could hear the psalm sung by the congregation; as best he could, he joined in the singing. But the funeral bells affected him most. Later he wrote, “I hear this dead brother of ours, who is now carried out to his burial, to speak to me, and to preach my funeral sermon in the voice of these bells. In him, O God, thou hast accomplished to me even the request of [the rich man] to Abraham; thou hast sent one from the dead to speak unto me.” Confronted by thoughts of his own mortality, Donne prayed to God that if his fever were fatal he would die, “drowned...in the blood of thy Son; and if I live longer, yet I may now die the death of the righteous, die to sin; which death is a resurrection to a new life.”¹

Donne’s experience illustrates the benefit of reflecting on the end of life as we know it. Thinking about our end can help us live well—and die well. Especially in our day, with low infant mortality rates, long life spans, and a medical model that typically removes dying people from society, we need to seize—and sometimes create—opportunities to focus on our end. And if we understand human death as a sign that even “the heavens will pass away,” the whole world will be laid bare, and “all these things will be dissolved” (2 Peter 3:10–11), then we also need to give thought to the end of everything.

1. John Donne, Devotions upon Emergent Occasions and Death’s Duel (New York: Random House, 1999), 100–101.

We need eschatology. With God’s help, that snooty, foreign-sounding word can introduce to us a world of comfort, for this age and the age to come.

Thanks to Will Hesterberg and his ministry partners at ITEM (item.org) for inviting me to teach a modular course on eschatology at Mihael Starin Theological Seminary in Osijek, Croatia. While preparing those lectures I also preached through the themes of the last things in my home congregation, Immanuel Fellowship Church in Kalamazoo, Michigan. I have been greatly helped both by the input from beloved congregants during several sermon discussion meetings and by the spirited questions and conversations over these themes with the students in Croatia. An earlier form of some of these chapters appeared in the Outlook, the bimonthly publication of Reformed Fellowship, and are published here with permission.

I am extremely grateful for John “Jack” Jeffery’s careful reading of the manuscript and his numerous grammatical, literary, and theological suggestions. Sue Verschoof also helped catch a number of typos. A special thanks to David, Jay, Joel, Steve, and the rest of the amazing team at Reformation Heritage Books. I am privileged to serve alongside excellent elders at Immanuel who have a vision for the church that extends beyond our congregation and who, therefore, generously encouraged me in this project.

Thank you Hazel, Mina, Evangelia, Asher, and especially Amy for helping to fill my life with love, joy, adventure, and anticipation as we journey together closer to that last day.

PART ONE

INTRODUCING ESCHATOLOGY

Why Should I Study the End Times?

Eschatology, the study of the last things, is a fancy word for something we all already do. All of us think about the end. Yes, our culture and our fears push to the periphery thoughts of our death and the life hereafter. But count on it: at some point in your life, you are going to agonize over what will happen to you after you breathe your last. You can't attend a funeral—whether of a religious or nonreligious person—without hearing somebody's eschatology or their concept of what happens after death. We are all eschatologists. But that doesn't mean we always engage the end times well. In at least three ways we could go wrong in this most basic theological discipline.

First, we are tempted to engage in speculative eschatology. When end-times study is not rooted in Scripture, it becomes vain dreaming, the dogmatization of our wishes. In a time of unfathomable suffering and pain, Job asked his mostly well-meaning friends, "How then will you comfort me with empty nothings? There is nothing left of your answers but falsehood" (Job 21:34 ESV). When it comes to matters of eternal life and death we need more than "empty nothings." We need more than traditional religious rituals and mantras that suggest, sometimes superficially, that the best is yet to come. The effervescent goal of living a decent life falls pitifully short of guaranteeing a blessed eternity. Vague wishes of a better afterlife are impotent to deliver solid hope. Speculative eschatology is a sign of biblical illiteracy and spiritual immaturity. When it comes to the end times, we need to put childish ways behind us and listen to what God says.

Second, we should beware of argumentative eschatology. For some of us the very topic of the end times is off-putting because it can be such a contentious issue. Some of us have felt our Christianity questioned by those who have a different concept of the end. But surely God does not peel back the curtains of future history, giving us a glimpse into the staggering profundity of death and judgment or the glorious return of the King of Heaven that we might contend with other Christians over how things will work out. It is certainly possible—and necessary—to distinguish between two conflicting end-times views without needlessly blustering about the perceived superiority of one's own view.

Third, we must avoid avoiding eschatology. It sounds pious to say, “I don't think much about the last things. I know God is in control. I'll leave it up to Him.”¹ Is eschatology even necessary? Isn't it enough to simply trust that God will work everything out in the end? Should we not approach this topic with the attitude of David, who said, “Neither do I concern myself with great matters, nor with things too profound for me” (Ps. 131:1)? In reality, Scripture teaches us to develop what some have called an “apocalyptic spirituality”² in which we so deeply sense the dawning of the age to come that we begin to realize its wonder in this present age. The apostle Peter captures in a single phrase Scripture's unified application of eschatology. In light of God's plan to dissolve and purify the cosmos he asks, “What manner of persons ought you to be in holy conduct and godliness?” (2 Peter 3:11).

1. For a reflection on modern apathy on eschatological themes, see Geerhardus Vos, Redemptive History and Biblical Interpretation: The Shorter Writings of Geerhardus Vos, ed. Richard B. Gaffin Jr. (Phillipsburg, N.J.: Presbyterian and Reformed, 1980), 317–19.

2. See, for example, Bernard McGinn, ed., Apocalyptic Spirituality: Treatises and Letters of Lactantius, Adso of Montier-en-Der, Joachim of Fiore, the Franciscan Spiritualists, Savonarola, The Classics of Western Spirituality: A Library of the Great Spiritual Masters (Mahwah, N.J.: Paulist Press, 1979).

With Peter, Jesus (Mark 13:35–37) and Paul (1 Thess. 5:6) call God’s people to respond to the coming of the end with watchful sobriety. The same emphasis is found in Hebrews 10:25. Seeing “the Day approaching” ought to strengthen our hope, devote us to worship, and galvanize us in our expressions of love and good works. If Christ is returning, if His judgment will be eternal, and if hell is as terrible as heaven is delectable, then studying the end times is eminently practical. Those who lose sight of the end can become careless in their conduct and arrogant in their rejection of God (see 2 Peter 3:1–7). By contrast, a biblical eschatology provides a rationale for ethics that goes deeper than pragmatic concerns. With God’s help eschatology can chill our blood at the thought of sin and judgment, and it can warm our hearts with God’s gracious work of redemption.

God invites us to meditate on the future, not to speculate or altercate but to better share His perspective on this life and the life to come. And this is how we should study the topic. The way Scripture and the church’s historic confessions teach eschatology is much more like gazing upon a dazzling sunset than analyzing and describing the chemical properties of the sun.³ We need more than a skeletal, technical, clinical understanding of the end times. We need a robust eschatological vision that can invigorate us with the reality that God’s last work will change everything and that the change has begun.

So how can a believing understanding of eschatology promote “holy conduct and godliness”? Here are ten answers, not to prove the validity of the study of the end times but to help us begin to praise God for the beauty of His promise to be with His people till the end (Deut. 31:6).

3. See especially the Belgic Confession of Faith (henceforth BC), article 37.

1. Eschatology Personalizes and Universalizes Our Understanding of the Future

The study of the last things is usually divided into two parts. The Bible teaches that the history of this age will one day come to an end (1 Peter 4:7). Moreover, this present age will not quietly spin itself out of existence; it will end in an epic crisis and the start of a new age (2 Peter 3:10–11). When we think about this crisis—the return of Christ, the last judgment, the realization of the kingdom, and the population of heaven and hell—we are studying general eschatology. General eschatology draws us into thinking about more than simply what will happen to me when I die.

But before the coming of this great crisis, most people will have experienced the end of this age through death. When we consider death, the continued existence of the soul, and the intermediate state into which the dead enter, we are engaged in individual eschatology. This discipline can help people who are overly focused on this present age to meditate on their personal eternity.

2. Eschatology Elucidates Christian Theology

Eschatology is not an isolated doctrine. The last things can be studied as a doctrinal unit, one of the six heads of sacred theology. But the doctrine is also “a lens through which we come to understand the whole system of Christian faith and practice.”⁴ Studying the last things is like getting to the end of a novel; the entire story begins to make sense. Abraham Kuyper noted that every other division of theology “left some question unanswered, to which eschatology should supply the answer.”⁵ For the doctrine of God eschatology shows the completion of His work and providence. For the doctrine of man it punctuates both the natural end of sin and God’s work of restoration. For the doctrine

4. Michael Horton, The Christian Faith (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 2011), 906.

5. Quoted in Louis Berkhof, Systematic Theology (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1939), 665.

of Christ it expositis the full meaning of Jesus's words from the cross: "It is finished" (John 19:30). For the doctrine of salvation it reveals how the Spirit will finally help bring about the deliverance that He has been sent to guarantee (Eph. 1:13–14). Finally, for the doctrine of the church it previews the glorious end of God's people who are presently embroiled in spiritual conflict. The doctrine of the end times is not a segregated article of faith but the consummation of the Bible's teaching on everything.

3. Eschatology Interprets Redemptive History

If we think of world history as a four-act drama—creation, fall, redemption, and restoration—we see how eschatology helps us understand each act.⁶ First, the end times helps us understand the full trajectory of creation. In the early chapters of Genesis we learn that God is not only infinitely creative but also deeply relational. The garden is a picture of God's desire to dwell with His people in the beauty of a flawless friendship. But from the vantage point of Eden, it is not abundantly clear where God's world is heading. Eschatology shows us how God leads His people from a garden to a city that is built around a beautiful and safe relationship with Him.

Second, concerning the fall, everyone can sense the brokenness of this present age. Our conflicts and tears, bodily deterioration, and the certainty of death make us groan (2 Cor. 5:1–3). But our groaning expresses more than our desire to escape our terrors or the aches and pains of our body. We also yearn to be "further clothed, that mortality may be swallowed up by life" (2 Cor. 5:4). Eschatology helps shape our groaning according to God's promise of a better life (2 Cor. 5:1–4).

Third, in this present age, God is carrying out a work of redemption. Christ has come into our world declaring peace and pardon. He has offered His blessed body to satisfy the demands of the law's curse (Gal. 3:10). He invites us to believe in Him and share in the benefits of His saving work. He has been raised from the dead to assure us that death has been swallowed up in victory (1 Cor. 15:54). Eschatology helps us to rejoice in God's already-present gift of salvation while reserving abundant hope for the life to come.

6. See Timothy Keller, The Prodigal God: Recovering the Heart of the Christian Faith (New York: Penguin, 2008), 95–103.

Fourth, one day God will restore His fallen people. So that we don't become either too comfortable or despondent in this present age, God confronts us with "the glory which shall be revealed in us" (Rom. 8:18). Lest we dismiss this world as insignificant, Scripture insists that the coming, complete restoration will reflect a measure of continuity with this present age.

4. Eschatology Pinpoints Believers' Current Place in History

We daily experience the tension of living between two worlds or ages. The New Testament regularly speaks of two successive ages or systems: this age⁷ (cf. Matt. 12:32; Rom. 12:2) or the present age (Gal. 1:4; 1 Tim. 6:17), and "that age" (Luke 20:35) or "the age to come" (Matt. 12:32; see also Eph. 1:21). Vos writes, "Believers live in the 'last days,' upon them 'the ends of the ages are come,' but 'the last day,' 'the consummation of the age,' still lies in the future.... The contrast between these ages is (especially with Paul) that between the evil and transitory, and the perfect and abiding."⁸ Understanding our place on God's redemptive time line delivers us from false expectations of a utopian age divorced from Christ's second coming. It also helps banish nagging fears that "all things continue as they were from the beginning of creation" (2 Peter 3:4). We live in a time of labor, though we anticipate an eternal rest.

7. In many instances (e.g., Matt. 13:22; Rom. 12:2) the Greek aion is translated "world" but denotes less a place than an age or era and its spirit.

8. Vos, Redemptive History, 26, 28.

5. Eschatology Reinforces a Biblical View of Ecology

If this physical world is just a sinking ship or a vast wasteland waiting to be burned up with fire, with no correspondence to the coming age, then believers seem to have few compelling reasons to care for the environment.⁹ If not only humans but also every square inch of God's creation informs us of God's pattern for the new heavens and the new earth, however, then we can be encouraged to care for the earth since it should be as special to us as it is to God.

6. Eschatology Offers Hope in Suffering

For the believer, reflection on heaven provides an eternal context for our pain. This is what Paul has in mind when he says, "For I consider that the sufferings of this present age are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us" (Rom. 8:18). Jesus makes the same point with an illustration: "A woman, when she is in labor, has sorrow because her hour has come; but as soon as she has given birth to the child, she no longer remembers the anguish, for joy that a human being has been born into the world. Therefore you now have sorrow; but I will see you again and your heart will rejoice, and your joy no one will take from you" (John 16:21–22). The joy of restoration enables believers to face trials with unearthly contentment (see Heb. 12:2). Astoundingly, the Bible teaches that the joy we anticipate in glory actually begins to impinge our hearts even now. In the Gospels, especially in John, "the realities of the future life are so vividly and intensely felt to be existent in heaven and from there

9. See Francis Schaeffer, Pollution and the Death of Man: The Christian View of Ecology (Wheaton, Ill.: Tyndale, 1970); cf. Gale Z. Heide, "What Is New about the New Heaven and the New Earth? A Theology of Creation from Revelation 21 and 2 Peter 3," Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society 40, no.1 (March 1997): 37–56.

operative in the believer's life, that the distinction between what is now and what will be hereafter enjoyed becomes less sharp."¹⁰

7. Eschatology Moderates the Power of Politics

Every election cycle tempts us to either embrace the incoming leaders as messianic manifestations of God's salvation or cower before the new regime as a sure sign of the end of the world as we know it. A balanced eschatology assures us that our current leader is neither our savior nor one of the riders of the apocalypse, nor was the previous leader, nor will be the succeeding leader. Daniel's glimpse into the future contrasts the indestructible kingdom of the coming savior Jesus (Dan. 7:14) with the hosts of rulers whose kingdoms are now buried under ash and dust. Eschatology does not discourage us from political action, but it does keep our eyes fixed on the One whose kingdom will know no end (Luke 1:33).

8. Eschatology Urges Personal and Vocational Excellence

One of the main purposes of both of Paul's canonical letters to the Thessalonians was to correct the believers' faulty eschatology. Part of their error seems to have been a penchant for laziness since they reasoned, "Jesus is coming back; of what account is my work?" Paul invokes the returning Christ to urge these believers to "work in quietness and eat [your] own bread" (2 Thess. 3:12). Matthew Henry commented on Jacob's skill at the selective breeding of sheep in Genesis 30: "It becomes a man to be master of his trade, whatever it is, and to be not only industrious, but ingenious in it, and to be versed in all its lawful arts and mysteries."¹¹ The truth of this statement is magnified by the ongoing work of God in salvation and the consummation of His work promised in the doctrine of the last things.

10. Vos, Redemptive History, 28. Cf. BC 37.

11. Matthew Henry, Commentary on the Whole Bible (Old Tappan, N.J.: Fleming H. Revell, n.d), 1:183.

Peter says that when Christ returns we will be “found by Him” (2 Peter 3:14). Each of us will be doing something when we are found by God. No one should want to be found sinning either through laziness or any other vice. And we don’t know when Christ will return (2 Peter 3:10). So since we will all appear before Christ and His judgment seat, “we make it our aim, whether present or absent, to be well pleasing to Him” (2 Cor. 5:9).

9. Eschatology Invigorates Missions and Evangelism

When Revelation shows us the redeemed in glory, we realize that they were saved through the witness of believers in this present age (Rev. 20:4). God is patient in sending Christ because He is “not willing that any should perish but that all should come to repentance” (2 Peter 3:9). When we share God’s heart we will take up the Great Commission with new vigor. “The Church can be rightly understood only in an eschatological perspective.... The meaning of this ‘overlap of the ages’ in which we live, the time between the coming of Christ and his coming again, is that it is a time given for the witness of the apostolic Church to the ends of the earth.... The implication of a true eschatological perspective will be missionary obedience, and the eschatology which does not issue in such obedience is a false eschatology.”¹²

10. Eschatology Grounds Us in Christ

The Old Testament emphasis on the end times is largely centered on the history of Israel. The big question is, What is the destiny of God’s people? But the later prophets’ increased focus on the individual masterfully prepares the way for the coming of Christ who, at the same time, fulfills the calling of Israel to “do justly, love mercy, and to walk humbly with your God” (Micah 6:8) and opens by His blood a new and living way for individuals to enter into a restored life with God (Heb. 10:19–22). The last days began with the first coming of Christ. The starkness of the contrast between this present age and the age to come, between this world and the next, was never as obvious as at the coming of Christ. To think eschatologically is to think Christologically.

12. Lesslie Newbigin, The Household of God: Lectures on the Nature of the Church (New York: Friendship Press, 1954), 153–54.

One final caution: we need to exercise biblical reserve when we study the end times. The Bible hasn't said nearly enough to satisfy the curiosity of the inquisitive. But it has said enough about the end times to encourage us to study it. And when studied and believed, the doctrines of the last things can inspire us with the joy, patience, and holiness of the One whose return we eagerly await.